It was not, however, until her father s easy-going confiding nature, and a lawsuit, brought ruin on his family, that she gave the out-pouring of her genius to the world. Song is born of suffering, and when, in 1818, the family had to surrender the luxurious estate their ancestors had held from the days of Henry VIII., the wrench at the unexpected parting affected Dora exceedingly. It was a blow from which she never wholly recovered, as her correspondence even twenty years later could testify. She had grown up from shy and gentle childhood to imaginative soul-searching womanhood, in those pleasant places where she and her family thought they were as safely planted as the trees. Sad was the reverse when only the interest of Mrs. Greenwell s own fortune remained to them. As Dora expressed it, Money troubles do away with the pleasant glossy part of life, and her opinion that Making both ends meet is such a miserable idea of perfection, I should like them to tie in a handsome bow, was the playful expression of her own painful experience. On the sale of his house and lands, Mr. Greenwell, his wife, and daughter, went to live for a time at Ovingham Rectory, Northumberland, with the eldest son William, now Canon Greenwell, of Durham, the noted antiquary and geologist. It was during her brief residence here, in 1848, that Miss Greenwell sent her first volume of...
